Media freedom in China is declining at "breakneck speed", as the Communist government finds new ways to intimidate international journalists, the Foreign Correspondents' Club of China (FCCC) said in a recent survey.

The survey found that Chinese intimidation of foreign journalists has increased, with the Chinese government using new ways to intimidate journalists and their sources.

"We are facing unprecedented hurdles," the FCCC said in a statement. "Foreign journalists in China are facing a new level of threats and intimidation, including threats of legal action, online attacks and increasing surveillance."
